

Getting good evidence for the NDIS

To get the right NDIS support for your child, you and the professionals who are involved in your child's life need to provide evidence of your child's needs and the care you provide.

What is good evidence?

Good evidence is information from professionals about your child's needs. It can include:

A summary letter from your GP or paediatrician

This is a short letter stating your child's diagnosis and the date they were diagnosed, the impact it has on your child's life, and what support they need. It should also state that the disability is lifelong. It can include information on what will happen if support is not continued or provided. The doctor needs to have known your child for more than six months to write a summary letter.

Reports from therapists

These reports focus on how your child's disability impacts their capacity to do everyday things. They include recommendations for support that will help your child meet their goals.

Assessments from therapists

These assessments are done by people such as occupational therapists, speech therapists and psychologists. They assess how your child is doing compared with children of the same age without disability.

This can include checking your child's motor skills, communication skills, hearing, or vision, and how they understand information. Some assessment appointments are covered by Medicare but there may be an out-of-pocket cost.

Having a recent Functional Assessment done by an occupational therapist is helpful. If your child already has an NDIS plan, make sure you leave enough in your child's budget to fund a Functional Assessment and request it before your plan ends. These assessments can take a few weeks to finish, so it's good to start early.

All the information you provide as evidence should be current and not more than two years old.

It's ok to ask for your plan meeting to be postponed if assessments and reports take longer than expected. It's important the NDIS has all the information to get a clear picture of your child's needs.

How can I make sure the reports are useful?

GPs, paediatricians, and allied health therapists should write reports in a way that supports NDIS planning.

Report recommendations need to include:

- How they relate to the child's disability
- How they will help achieve your child's goals
- How they will increase or maintain functional capacity and social and economic participation
- How they are evidence-based and value for money

Make sure reports are accurate

Read all reports to check they are accurate and easy to understand. If you have multiple therapists they should be working together. Make sure their reports don't contradict each other.

Ask for any corrections to be made before you give your documents to the NDIS. You can also ask for a summary paragraph at the start of the document.

Keep a copy of all information you give to the NDIS, early childhood partner or Local Area Coordinator (LAC). If you email information, ask for confirmation it has been received.

Evidence that what you do is above and beyond parental responsibility

Often parents of children with disability provide a much higher level of care to their child when compared to a similar aged child without disability.

The NDIS will look at whether your child's needs are greater than those of a similar aged child because of their disability. They will consider what the NDIS can provide and what support is normally provided by parents.

Information from families is one of the most important sources of evidence that the care you provide is greater than what is normally considered parental responsibility. Choose a way to record this information that works best for you.

This can include:

- A spreadsheet recording how much time you spend caring for your child. Make sure you include all the administrative tasks involved with your child's care
- A detailed diary describing the care you provide over 24 hours or over one week
- A video of how caring for your child is different from caring for a child without disability
- A timetable of what a week looks like, including appointments

You can also ask your child's therapists to include in their reports information about the additional care your child needs compared to a child without disability of a similar age.

Evidence for respite and support for your family

A Carer Statement is really good evidence of the impact of caring on your family as a whole. It's a good way to highlight your family situation, such as being a single parent, having other children with disability or caring for elderly parents.

Useful links

Providing evidence of your disability

<https://www.ndis.gov.au/applying-access-ndis/how-apply/information-support-your-request/providing-evidence-your-disability>

Practical resources for GPs and other health professionals

<https://www.ndis.gov.au/applying-access-ndis/how-apply/information-gps-and-health-professionals/practical-resources-gps-and-other-health-professionals>

10 steps to excellent NDIS therapy reports: VALID's guide to NDIS therapist reports for allied health professionals

<https://valid.org.au/resources-and-media/resources/10-steps-excellent-ndis-therapy-reports/>

Related topics

Writing a Carer Statement

<https://www.acd.org.au/writing-a-carer-statement/>

Getting respite under the NDIS

<https://www.acd.org.au/getting-respite-under-the-ndis/>